On this day in 1954, Hungary faced Brazil in the World Cup quarterfinals in Bern, Switzerland. What started as a highly anticipated match turned into one of the most chaotic games in tournament history — dubbed the "Battle of Berne."

Hungary won 4-2, but the game featured multiple red cards, on-field fights, and even a post-match locker room brawl (with boots and bottles reportedly involved). Three players were sent off, and it's remembered more for the mayhem than the goals!

Estimated 20,000 to 30,000 Scottish fans (collectively known as the "Tartan Army") descended on Boston for the World Cup, their unprecedented drinking habits left local establishments scrambling to restock

The Flights: airline staff reported that Scottish fans on flights heading into Boston drank the plane's entire alcohol supply before landing.

The Sam Adams Taproom reported that fans drank four times as much flagship Boston Lager over a four-day stretch as the venue typically sells during busy holidays like the Fourth of July. This forced them to schedule emergency keg deliveries.

Local Pubs, also ran dry, reporting that weekend sales were triple what they see on St. Patrick's Day.

Invented in 1818 by English engineer Sir William Cubitt, the treadmill was initially designed as a torture and reform device for inmates in British prisons. Instead of a moving belt, the first machines were large paddle wheels with steps. Prisoners were forced to hold onto a rail and continuously climb for up to 10 hours a day. These penal treadmills were eventually banned in the late 19th century due to their excessive cruelty.

The concept didn't return until the 1950s when cardiologist Dr. Robert Bruce and researcher Wayne Quinton at the University of Washington repurposed the motorized treadmill to diagnose heart disease. This gave birth to the famous Bruce Protocol cardiac stress test, which eventually paved the way for the home and commercial exercise treadmills we use today.
